We'll get the mandate unless CBO screws it up; but that seems to be moving along, so hopefully, it won't be a problem. As the story below said, the mandate was in the Senate Finance walkthrough document. Not even as an option, just proposed, so Grassley signed off on it.

Lots of things could fall in the direction of your campaign proposal - a mandate with a smallish version of the exclusion along with a premium cap. That's by no means assured, but if it does break that way, I will try to ensure I'm not the only one who notices (between us, of course).

Things seem to be going pretty ok with health care. Bills will be emerging soon. Financing is a concern. And the public plan is in trouble. Wyden introduced the idea of a trigger in committee about ten days ago in the private Finance walkthrough, and since then, it's the idea all these Senators are glomming onto; it may be difficult to get more than that out of the Senate. [REDACTED] The House seems to be standing a bit firm for now though, but even there, the public plan has some issues.

The best people to talk to are Rahm - he's doing message, strategy and overseeing the Hill - and Nancy-Ann, who is running point at the White House. She's a big fan of yours (and did a lot in the primary as a surrogate for us). I like her a lot. Peter doesn't really have the ball (right now). Nancy-Ann very much works for Rahm

I hope you've gotten some rest too this weekend, but with all the world's travails, I know that might not be likely. I'll keep in touch.

Neera

Let's hope we get the mandate since we know nothing will work w/out it. So how's it going? If I were to talk to one or two decision makers about a few matters, who would that be--Orszag? Rahm or Zeke? Nancy Ann? Or???

Hope you're enjoying some time off today. Pls stay in touch.

This was on Paul Krugman's blog yesterday. I, for one, enjoyed it. Hope you're very well Hillary.

Ahem

Politico <<http://www.politico.com/news/stories/0509/22669.html>> :

Health care could soon go the way of the automobile, with users having no choice but to buy insurance coverage.

Within four years, every American could be required to own health insurance or pay their way through tax penalties. The odds of such a sea change rose last week when chief Democratic and Republican Senate negotiators on a health care bill acknowledged that many on the Finance Committee considered the so-called individual mandate essential to lower insurance costs for those who already have coverage.

President Barack Obama didn't embrace the individual mandate during the campaign, which means he would essentially start from scratch in terms of selling the idea to voters.

The mandate was a central policy difference with Hillary Clinton, who argued that a mandate was the only way to achieve universal coverage. Obama disagreed, saying enough people would purchase insurance voluntarily if the costs could be brought down.

Progressive policy experts widely agreed that Obama's plan would have left out about 15 million people. Clinton, with an assist from New York Times columnist Paul Krugman, regularly assailed Obama for his no-mandate position.

Actually, I don't care who gets credit, as long as we actually get universal health care.
