That must have been a surreal moment--so far from home but so present. He did a great job for the President, the party and the country.

Come see me when you have time this week.

I'm in the business lounge at Dubai airport en route to Dhaka watching your husband's extraordinary speech and surrounded by countless foreigners all cheering him on. Only he would elicit that kind of reaction at home and abroad! I think it was his most brilliant performance yet, all bias aside. [redacted] emailed me in the middle of it to say that you have to run for president so she can work for you!!!

The BMENA meeting in Morocco went better than I anticipated with a really impressive group of participants from the region -- men and women, NGO and govt reps speaking candidly from their experiences about the key issues that need to be addressed. The Arab Spring has created a whole new understanding about the role of women and that was underscored over and over. I will write you a short summary as they provided many important insights. Last night I met with a group of women leaders over dinner at Laila Aloui's. (Ed Gabriel dropped by.) We -- Americans and Moroccans -- all talked about you. As Laila said, "We're Hillary people." The women are so concerned that the future of the family law reform, women's equality in the constitution and their other achievements will be reversed by the Islamists. I think they have to find a way to organize themselves and even act as an influential force in the region. I'm going to see if VV will do more in the region to help. Ed was in background discussions on the upcoming strategic dialogue. He said the Moroccans want women's empowerment on the dialogue agenda (I'll follow up). He also said the King was very grateful to you for making the dialogue happen. They are not without big challenges there. Good luck at the APEC meetings!
