Here are three pieces that I think you will like and learn from .

- 1) A smart piece from a blog called "Architecture for Development" called. "It's the Elites, Stupid." It begins with a discussion of the role of aid relative to the rest of a country's GDP – aid accounts for some 3% and should not be held responsible for "ending poverty" but rather improving people's lives; ending poverty depends on what happens with the other 97% of GDP, which is controlled by a country's elites. Then the question – which is the same question you ask – is whether those elites are actually doing something to develop their country or not. He distinguishes between "elite bashing" and holding elites accountable.

- 2) A piece by a 28 year old Briton on the riots. I sent it to David Miliband with the following description: "it brings together the moral arguments of the right and the sociological arguments of the left in a way that argues above all for reconnecting the worlds of rich and poor – not redistributing but reconnecting, so that we inhabit the same physical and moral universe. It absolutely insists that the looters be held responsible, but it insists on the haves being held responsible as well." I think there is a very important point here that I am going to try to develop and I would be happy to help you develop in a speech: growing interdependence has not meant growing inter-connection – actually quite the opposite – income inequality means we increasingly inhabit separate worlds and are no longer part of the same moral universe. <http://grimeandreason.blogspot.com/>
- 3) A thoughtful piece by a wonderful woman named Myra McDonald, a Reuters journalist based in Pakistan, on the New Yorker article about the capture of bin Ladin and what it reveals about a much broader mindset – her overall point is that the entire account of the capture as given by the SEALs treats the Pakistani people as little more than extras in a Hollywood movie. If we are really going to make diplomacy about government to society, we have to really factor in society very differently in how we think about the world – the point of my new column. <http://blogs.reuters.com/pakistan/2011/08/08/when-there-are-no-people-in-pakistan/>

None of these is very long!
Best,
